How you can help protect wildlife.

-Turn off your Geotag!

GPS enabled smart phones add physical coordinates of where the photo was taken. Tourists then post photos to social media which are used by poachers to track down wildlife such as rhino. Turning off your Geotag locator protects Tanzania's wildlife.

A bustling city located in the north of the country and shadowed by the stunning Mt Meru, Arusha is known as the heartland of safaris into Tanzania. Its endless plains are teeming with zebra, wildebeest, antelope and elephants. And if you're a fan of big cats, you'll love it even more, with more than 50% of Tanzania's lion population residing within its boundaries. Make sure those cameras are switched on and ready to go! We'll spend the night camping under the starry African sky. It's an experience you'll never forget.

Today we will set off early for a spectacular dawn game drive. Remember to look up in the trees too as you'll be on the lookout for lions, cheetahs and leopards as well as all of the ground-dwelling animals. January and February are the birthing season for zebra and wildebeest, so if you spot something small and cute, don't be surprised! We have time for one more early morning game drive in the Serengeti before we make our way to the rim of the Ngorongoro crater. This incredible volcanic crater was formed over three million years ago and was designated as a National Park in 1979. The crater is home to the largest elephants in Tanzania and the only park where you'll find the black rhino.
